Scenario 1: Responding to a Vulnerable Confession

Scenario
Your best friend is going through a breakup. You have been interested in them for years, but nothing ever happened because you were afraid to confess. While feeling lost and uncertain, your friend confides in you and admits feelings you have been hoping to hear for years. You are unsure whether they are in the right state of mind to begin a relationship.

Questions to consider

- This could be your one and only chance to be with your crush, but would it feel right?
- Is acting on their confession wrong, even if they consent?
- Just because you can act on the opportunity, does that mean you should?

Relation to the text
Consent is not enough. Desire should not come at the expense of someone's vulnerability. Just because there is consent does not necessarily mean that the interaction is moral or ethical (Perry).

Responses

- A. Tell them you feel the same, but suggest waiting until they've had time to process the breakup before starting anything.
- B. Take the opportunity and pursue the relationship now because their feelings may be genuine regardless of the timing.
- C. Tell them how you feel, but leave the decision entirely in their hands and trust them to know what they want.
- D. Keep your feelings to yourself for now because acting while they are vulnerable would make you uncomfortable.

Scenario 2: Choosing Between Two Opportunities

Scenario
Your partner of seven years receives an opportunity of a lifetime but must move out of town. You also have an important opportunity. Neither of you wants a long-distance relationship, and you both had plans to eventually get married. The ring has already been purchased.

Questions to consider

- Do you sacrifice your opportunity for your partner?
- Whose happiness should be prioritized?
- How do you make a decision when things will change forever regardless of what you choose?

Relation to the text
Fisher discusses how partners can change their lives to accommodate one another. What happens when both people are being asked to make sacrifices?

Responses

- A. Give up your opportunity and move with your partner because preserving the relationship matters more to you.
- B. Ask your partner to give up their opportunity because you believe yours is more important to your future.
- C. Both take the opportunities and attempt long distance even though neither of you originally wanted it.
- D. Accept that neither person should have to sacrifice such an important opportunity and seriously consider ending the relationship.

Scenario 3: Staying After Romantic Feelings Fade

Scenario
Your partner has supported you through everything. When you had stage-three cancer, they paid your medical bills, took time off work, and turned down career opportunities to care for you. About a year after you fully recover, you realize that you have lost your romantic feelings. You do not know how to tell them that you may no longer be compatible because you do not want to hurt them or make the wrong decision.

Questions to consider

- Do you confess how you feel?
- Do you stay in the relationship because of everything your partner did for you?
- Should you ask for a break or reflect before making a final decision?

Relation to the text
Brogard discusses whether someone should stay in a relationship when they no longer want to, especially when they do not know how to leave. Staying may also be connected to an attachment based on obligation rather than romantic love. Fisher argues that love is mutable and volatile. Can you continue to love someone without feeling romantic attraction?

Responses

- A. Tell them honestly that your feelings have changed, even though you know it may deeply hurt them.
- B. Stay in the relationship for now because everything they sacrificed makes leaving feel unfair.
- C. Ask for time apart so you can determine whether your feelings are truly gone or simply changing.
- D. Stay and actively try to rebuild the romantic connection before deciding whether to leave.

Scenario 4: Harm Caused During a PTSD Episode

Scenario
Your partner is a military veteran with severe PTSD. One night, while you are both sleeping, they have an episode and strangle you. You scream, and they eventually stop and realize what they have done. You remember how caring and important they have been to you, and you believe they would never intentionally hurt you.

Questions to consider

- Do you stay because of your partner’s history and the belief that they did not mean to hurt you?
- Do you leave because you are afraid it could happen again?
- Can one violent incident be separated from the rest of the relationship?

Relation to the text
Brogard discusses rational and irrational love and whether love can be justified under difficult circumstances. She also examines the history of love. Does one moment disqualify someone’s love, or are they still the same person they were before? This also raises questions about emotional dependence (Fisher).

Responses

- A. End the relationship because loving someone does not require remaining in a situation where you no longer feel safe.
- B. Separate temporarily while your partner receives professional help, then reconsider the relationship later.
- C. Remain in the relationship because you believe the incident does not represent who your partner truly is.
- D. Tell your partner that continuing the relationship would require significant changes, professional treatment, and rebuilding trust over time.

Scenario 5: Choosing Between Love and Family Approval

Scenario
You have been with your partner for a long time, but your parents disapprove of the relationship. If you remain with your partner, you will lose your inheritance. You love your partner, but you also have a good relationship with your parents and do not want to lose everything.

Questions to consider

- Do you go against your parents’ wishes for love?
- Do you sacrifice your relationship to preserve your relationship with your family and your inheritance?

- How much should outside pressure influence a romantic decision?

Relation to the text
This connects to Fisher's "Romeo and Juliet" effect, in which adversity or barriers can intensify romantic passion. In some cases, obstacles do not weaken a person's love for someone else.

Responses

- A. Stay with your partner because your family should not determine who you are allowed to love.
- B. End the relationship because maintaining your family connection and financial future matters more.
- C. Refuse to choose immediately and try to repair the conflict between your family and partner.
- D. Distance yourself from your parents without ending the relationship, hoping they eventually reconsider.

Scenario 6: Discovering a Partner's Private Fantasies

Scenario
You need to complete some work, so you use your partner's computer. You find a strange-looking tab and discover that your partner has been using an AI chatbot to fulfill fantasies without telling you. You feel betrayed and inadequate.

Questions to consider

- Do you confront your partner?
- Do you try to satisfy their desires yourself out of guilt?
- What does their private activity mean about the relationship?

Relation to the text
Is your partner feeling excluded from sexual intimacy, or do they feel deprived in a way that led them to seek other sources of pleasure? You are not an object for someone else's desire, and your partner is not entitled to sex or sexual access (Srinivasan).

Responses

- A. Talk to them about why they kept it secret and what the AI interaction means to them before deciding how you feel.
- B. Treat it as a private fantasy and accept that partners do not have to share every sexual thought with each other.
- C. Tell them you consider the secrecy a violation of your relationship boundaries, even if no other person was involved.
- D. Ask whether there are unmet needs in the relationship, while making clear that you do not feel obligated to participate in fantasies you are uncomfortable with.

Scenario 7: Loving Someone Despite Their Past

Scenario
You have been in a loving and happy relationship for two and a half years. However, the relationship did not begin this way. Early on, your partner did something disturbing. You forgave them, and they have changed for the better, but the memory still lingers. You cannot forget what happened even though they are no longer the same person.

Questions to consider

- Do you go to therapy?
- Do you talk openly with your partner about the lingering memory?
- Do you end the relationship even though your partner has changed?

Relation to the text
Brogard connects love to history. Her example mainly involves relationships that are later disqualified by an action committed deep into the relationship. This scenario asks whether love can be disqualified by something that happened in the past despite apparent redemption. There is a difference between discovering a dark or disturbing thing about someone after entering a relationship and knowing about something they did beforehand but choosing to begin a relationship anyway.

Responses

- A. Judge them primarily by the person they have consistently shown themselves to be since then.
- B. Talk openly with them because forgiveness has not erased the impact the event still has on you.
- C. End the relationship because you realize that, despite their change, you cannot emotionally move past what happened.
- D. Seek outside help or counseling before deciding whether the past should determine the future of the relationship.

Scenario 8: Remaining Feelings for an Ex

Scenario
You have been with your current partner for a year and genuinely love them. However, thoughts of your ex continue to surface, and you eventually realize that you never completely lost your feelings for them. Your ex texts you, and you do not know how to respond.

Questions to consider

- Do you text your ex back?
- Do you block them?
- Do you tell your current partner?
- Do you confide in someone else?

Relation to the text
Brogard argues that love exists in degrees. Being in a past relationship does not mean that love for that person has completely disappeared. It may have diminished, but it can still exist. Love also varies between people; you may love one person more than another.

Responses

- A. Do not respond because having feelings does not mean you need to act on them.
- B. Respond and talk with your ex because you need to understand whether those feelings still mean something.

- C. Tell your current partner about the feelings before making any decision involving your ex.
- D. Take time to reconsider your current relationship before communicating with either person about the future.

Scenario 9: Meeting Someone New While Dating

Scenario
You have been using a dating app and matched with someone. You have been talking and spending time together for about three weeks. One day, you attend a party and begin talking to someone you find extremely attractive.

Questions to consider

- Are you already committed to the person you met through the dating app?
- Do you tell them that you are interested in someone else?
- Do you explore the new attraction or focus on the relationship you started?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Explore the new connection because no commitment or exclusivity has been established.
- B. Continue focusing on the person you are already seeing because you want to give that connection a real chance.
- C. Talk with the person you are seeing about where the relationship is going before pursuing anyone else.
- D. Continue talking to both people until you have a clearer sense of what you want.

Scenario 10: Ending an Unequal Connection

Scenario
You have been going out with someone for a month and have gone on several dates. They are very interested in you, but you do not feel the same way. They try to arrange another date, but you are not interested.

Questions to consider

- Do you let them down directly?
- Should you soften the rejection?
- Is ghosting ever appropriate?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Directly tell them you enjoyed getting to know them but do not want the relationship to continue.
- B. Gradually reduce communication because you think a direct rejection would hurt them unnecessarily.
- C. Stop responding because you believe neither person owes much explanation after only a few dates.
- D. Go on another date because you are unsure whether attraction might develop with more time.

Scenario 11: Developing Feelings in a Casual Relationship

Scenario
You and a friend have recently gone through breakups and decide to hook up casually with no strings attached. You develop strong feelings for your friend, but you do not know whether to tell them or let the relationship continue as it is.

Questions to consider

- Do you tell your friend how you feel?
- Do you distance yourself to avoid further pain?
- Do you end the casual relationship?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Tell them exactly how you feel, knowing that honesty could end the arrangement.
- B. Continue casually because being close to them is better than losing the relationship entirely.
- C. End the sexual relationship without asking them to reciprocate feelings they never agreed to.
- D. Create some distance and give yourself time to determine whether the feelings are temporary or something deeper.

Scenario 12: Repeated Flirtation and Surveillance

Scenario
Your partner of five months has been liking another person’s posts and leaving flirtatious comments. You confront them, and they stop for a while. However, you download an app that allows you to spy on your partner and discover that they have started watching the other person’s stories and posts again.

Questions to consider

- Do you confront your partner again?
- How should you address the breach of trust on both sides?
- Is spying on your partner ever justified?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Confront them about breaking the boundary and also admit that you monitored them without their knowledge.
- B. Stop monitoring them and say nothing because you recognize that spying has damaged your own sense of trust.

- C. Continue monitoring them until you have stronger evidence that something inappropriate is happening.
- D. End the relationship because reaching the point of secretly monitoring each other suggests the trust is already gone.

Scenario 13: Sharing Phone Passwords

Scenario
Your partner wants to exchange phone passwords to build trust in the relationship. You have nothing to hide, but you still want to refuse.

Questions to consider

- Can you maintain privacy while still having trust?
- How do you explain your refusal without making your partner suspicious?
- Is sharing passwords a healthy way to build trust?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Exchange passwords because openness makes you feel more secure in a serious relationship.
- B. Refuse because you believe trust means respecting privacy rather than proving innocence.
- C. Explain your concerns and create specific boundaries about what each person considers private.
- D. Agree temporarily because you understand why your partner wants reassurance, but revisit the boundary later.

Scenario 14: Supporting a Friend in a Harmful Relationship

Scenario
You constantly see your friend being cheated on by their partner. No matter what their partner does, your friend continues to stay. Lecturing them does not help because they are stubborn. After some time, your friend begins to distance themselves from you by ignoring your texts and calls and refusing to acknowledge you in public.

Questions to consider

- Do you continue trying to help?
- Do you give your friend space?
- How do you support someone who does not want to leave?
- When does protecting yourself become necessary?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Stop criticizing the relationship and let them know you will still be there if they ever need support.
- B. Continue telling them what you think because staying silent would feel like supporting something harmful.
- C. Distance yourself from the friendship because watching the cycle continue has become emotionally exhausting.
- D. Apologize for pushing too hard but explain that you cannot pretend you believe the relationship is healthy.

Scenario 15: Being Treated Well Without Feeling Attraction

Scenario
You have been dating someone who seems perfect, but you realize that you are not romantically attracted to them. They have treated you better than anyone else, yet you still do not feel a spark.

Questions to consider

- Do you stay because they treat you well?

- Do you end the relationship even though they have done nothing wrong?
- Can emotional compatibility make up for a lack of romantic attraction?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Continue dating them because attraction may grow as emotional intimacy develops.
- B. End the relationship because they deserve someone who genuinely feels romantic attraction toward them.
- C. Tell them honestly how you feel and allow both of you to decide whether the relationship is worth continuing.
- D. Stay because stability, compatibility, and good treatment matter more to you than intense romantic passion.

Scenario 16: Sexual Pressure and Ultimatums

Scenario
You and your partner are having sex, and your partner wants to try something new. You strongly dislike the idea, and your refusal upsets them. They give you an ultimatum, saying that you do not love them because you will not do it and that they will leave if you refuse.

Questions to consider

- How do you respond to the pressure and ultimatum?
- Can your partner use your love as a reason to demand sexual activity?
- What does genuine consent require in this situation?

Relation to the text
To be provided.

Responses

- A. Maintain your boundary and tell them that love does not require participating in sexual acts you do not want.

- B. Tell them they are free to decide whether the incompatibility is a dealbreaker, but your answer about the act will not change.
- C. Step away from the relationship because using love as leverage makes you question whether your boundaries are respected.
- D. Suggest discussing other ways of addressing your different sexual preferences without crossing either person’s boundaries.
